Chemotherapy and Medical Radiation Therapy (CRT) in Malignant Pancreatic Disease. Medical Radiation Therapy (RT) and combination chemotherapy are used in the management of locally advanced or metastatic pancreatic adenocarcinoma (PDAC). The aim of this review is to evaluate the efficacy of RT and combination chemotherapy in PDAC. Medical radiation therapy is effective in palliation of symptoms or control of pancreatic cancer per se. In the absence of a recent phase III trial, the advantages and efficacy of combination chemotherapy, most often gemcitabine plus capecitabine, is unclear. Phase II trials have shown that chemoradiotherapy (CRT) appears to be more effective than radiotherapy alone in improving overall survival in locally advanced disease. In the most recent large randomized trial (CROS), an improvement in overall survival from about six to more than 12 months was documented in those patients receiving CRT compared to those receiving gemcitabine alone. In unresectable locally advanced disease and metastatic disease, based on similar large randomized trials, median overall survival ranged from 12 to 15 months. These results are unlikely to have changed the standard of care over the past 10 years. Alterations of tumour microenvironment contribute to cancer cell plasticity and chemoresistance in breast cancer. The tumour microenvironment plays an important role in cancer progression and metastasis. The tumour microenvironment also contributes to resistance of breast cancer cells to various cytotoxic drugs. To investigate the role of the tumour microenvironment in breast cancer and elucidate the molecular mechanism underlying breast cancer cell resistance to cytotoxic drugs, we co-cultured breast cancer cells and normal mouse fibroblast cells or bone marrow stromal cells as 3D microenvironment and evaluated the drug resistance and expression of multidrug resistance 1. Our results show that coculture of breast cancer cells with normal cells and/or bone marrow cells caused reduced drug

The effect of application of isolate M-170 of Trichoderma harzianum on the phytohormone concentrations of wheat was studied in a greenhouse experiment in which wheat was grown in a mixture of sand and a 2% solution of the fungus. The effect of the treatment on seed germination, seedling growth, and plant architecture was also studied. The phytohormones were extracted from root and shoot parts of the plants and were subsequently measured by gas chromatography and mass spectrometry. The concentration of indoleacetic acid in roots of treated plants was lower than that of the control, whereas treatment with M-170 increased the concentration of ind

Carcinoma of the lung associated with multiple primary non-Hodgkin lymphomas. Non-Hodgkin's lymphomas and lung cancer are the most common primary extranodal neoplasms occurring in the lung. An association of these two neoplasms is exceptional, because of the anatomical, histologic, and immunologic dissimilarities of these types of tumors. The association of multiple primary non-Hodgkin's lymphomas and lung cancer as a single process with bronchial origin was not previously reported. We describe a patient who presented with
