.. Sunday, July 7, 2013 When it comes to studying/training/teaching/mentoring for industrial engineers, is it better to stick with formal/informal education? What I find is that for those who are just learning, or starting their careers, it would be easier and cost effective to do an informal study, such as a distance learning class. There are more options to choose from, and it is much less expensive. There are also many more options than were available to me when I was in college, and early on in my career.

I'm not saying that in all cases it's the best way, but I think that there is a large population of people that can benefit from a distance learning approach. There are also other aspects that must be considered when it comes to an education, such as the path to keep learners interested, so that they would want to do the work. I have seen some distance learning classes that have students do homework assignments, which is a good thing. For some reason, I find that when I'm doing homework assignments for classes, the workload is much higher, so if I'm going to do homework, I want to do all of it. But when I don't do homework, I find that I'm a little less interested in the work. There are also many different ways to deliver content, and there is something to be said for delivering content through the comfort of one's own home, instead of having to sit in a classroom where one can get easily distracted. When I was in college, I was fortunate to have been a part of a number of research classes that were taught in the classroom. So I was exposed to a variety of different teaching techniques. It was great to see the different styles and approaches, and I found the experience to be very helpful when I was later on in my career. I think that an informal approach has a lot of potential, but there are also drawbacks that come with it. First of all, distance learning is not always affordable, and the type of content that can be delivered is limited. I've also found that some people don't want to get involved in a formalized education, because they want to pursue their own interests. For some, distance learning is not an option, because it would mean that they wouldn't have the time to participate. The concept of formalized education is very appealing, and in many cases it can lead to a successful career. 82157476af
