Urania Crack Urania OfflineMarisa Joseph/CNET Apple TV vs. Chromecast vs. Roku. What's the difference? How many people really use them? And which one is best? In a recent interview with THR, Apple CEO Tim Cook is asked to compare the popularity of Apple TV, Google's Chromecast and Roku. His answer: "Of the people who buy a television, nobody buys a Chromecast. Nobody buys Apple TV. And Roku users, I'd say, tend to be younger, more affluent than the others. So they watch things a little differently." We've looked through some numbers -- Apple TV has been out for two years, Chromecast for two, and Roku has been selling televisions for around 10 years. And we've picked five numbers that support Cook's comments, and one that doesn't. Jared Newman /CNET First things first: We're not comparing Chromecast and Roku with Apple TV because we don't think anyone cares. It's an apples-to-apples comparison, and Roku and Chromecast are equal so far. They're each using Wi-Fi to stream content from a variety of devices, including laptops, phones and tablets, and tablets. OK, with that out of the way, here are our five numbers. We're rounding to the closest whole number. One hundred People need 100 people to buy a product. It's a figure that the researchers at Forbes use in their studies to determine whether a product can make a dent in the market. Of the three players we're considering -- Apple TV, Chromecast and Roku -- Roku has well over 100,000. And with Roku's hardware sales now exceeding 100,000 units, it's clear Roku is on a tear. Three million That's how many Google Chromecast units have been sold to date. In February, Google revealed it has sold three million Chromecast devices, and one million of them are still in people's homes. The Web-connected, HDMI-enabled streaming stick was introduced in June 2013, and still sells at a profit. That's why we think it's fair to compare Apple TV to Chromecast in terms of size. Apple has sold more Apple TVs than Google has Chromecast units, but the Chromecast's sales trajectory clearly indicates it's on a tear as well. If the 3 million units Google has sold were spread evenly among markets, it would imply f678ca9f9e
